Restoration Not Resolutions

by Diana R. Sever, Bar President

January is long associated with resolutions—ambitious promises to change habits, overhaul routines, and somehow emerge by year's end as the most improved, disciplined version of ourselves. In the legal field, resolutions often take on an especially weighty character: bill more hours, grow the practice, publish more, network harder, manage stress better, give back more. While well-intentioned, this can feel less like a fresh start and more like another list of expectations.

This year let's consider a different approach—one that feels lighter, more sustainable, more human. Instead of sweeping resolutions, maybe we turn our focus to a simpler goal: do one nice thing each day and pay it forward.

At first blush, this idea may seem goofy, even trivial, when compared to the scale and seriousness of legal work. But small, consistent acts of kindness can have a meaningful impact—on clients, colleagues, the justice system, and ourselves.

In a profession defined by deadlines, adversarial postures, and high stakes, kindness is not always the default setting. But it is often the quality people remember most. A brief call to explain a confusing process to a client. A moment of patience with a young lawyer finding their footing. A courteous extension to opposing counsel when circumstances genuinely warrant it. None of these actions require a resolution or a dramatic change in professional identity, but each can alter the tone of an interaction—and sometimes its outcome.

Paying it forward also aligns naturally with our legal practice's ethical foundations. At its core, the law exists to serve people. Acts of kindness reinforce public trust in legal institutions and professionals, particularly at a time when that trust can feel fragile. When we lawyers choose empathy alongside advocacy, clarity alongside technical precision, and respect alongside zealous representation, they strengthen not only individual relationships but the profession as a whole.

Doing good deeds is also good for the soul. Burnout and stress remain major challenges in the legal field. Resolutions often fail because they demand too much, too quickly, from already stretched professionals. In contrast, the practice of doing one kind thing a day is achievable even on the busiest schedules. It invites presence rather than perfection. Over time, these small acts can quietly improve workplace culture, reduce friction, and remind us why many of us were drawn to the law in the first place.

Restoration Not Resolutions

by Diana R. Sever, Bar President (cont'd)

Importantly, “one nice thing” needn’t be performative or public. Maybe it’s mentoring someone without expectation of credit, sharing a resource with a colleague, volunteering an hour of pro bono advice or simply acknowledging someone else’s effort. The value lies not in recognition, but in continuity—the cumulative effect of daily choices to act with generosity and professionalism.

January is often framed as a month of pressure: new year, new goals, new benchmarks. But it can also be an opportunity to reset expectations. By shifting away from heavy resolutions and toward small, forward-looking acts, we give ourselves permission to grow incrementally. Paying it forward is not about lowering standards; it is about redefining success in a way that is sustainable, humane, and quietly powerful.

As the year unfolds, the legal challenges ahead will undoubtedly be complex. But the way we meet them—one interaction at a time—can still be shaped by intention. Perhaps this January, the most meaningful commitment we make is simply this: to leave each day, and each person we encounter, a little better than we found them.

APPROACHING OUR CENTENNIAL YEAR! Est. 1932

MISSED EXAMS, NOT MISSED RIGHTS: USERRA Compliance in Civil Service Promotions

by: Odise Carr, Esq.

Nearly three-quarters of a million Americans serve in the National Guard and Reserves while maintaining civilian careers. For New Jersey public employers operating under civil service, the Uniformed Services Employment and Reemployment Rights Act of 1994 (USERRA) is not theoretical; it is a recurring administrative obligation with tangible consequences for promotions and eligibility lists. A persistent source of USERRA noncompliance arises when service members miss promotional examinations due to military orders and are disadvantaged in eligibility list placement, an issue implicated in approximately 10% of referred DOL investigations.

USERRA requires returning servicemembers be reemployed in the position they would have attained but for military service and prohibits adverse actions motivated by that service, preempting any state or local rule that limits these protections. Central to the statute is the “escalator principle,” which requires placement on the career trajectory that would have occurred with reasonable certainty absent military service. Civil service systems struggle to apply this principle within fixed examination cycles and ranked eligibility lists.

New Jersey statutes and civil service rules preserve permanent status, seniority, and benefits for employees on military leave, and the framework generally functions well. Difficulty arises when a servicemember misses a promotional examination due to military orders. Regulations do not consistently specify examination access, scoring, or eligibility list placement, leaving these issues to Civil Service Commission determinations that are equitable but not uniform.

The absence of standardized examination access rules shifts USERRA compliance from a predictable process to an individualized remedy. Although agencies generally act in good faith, the lack of clear procedures invites inconsistency and unnecessary legal exposure. More significantly, it risks transforming the promotional examination itself into a barrier imposed by military service. When access to testing is foreclosed by military orders, the denial of the opportunity to compete constitutes the adverse action, even where promotion isn’t guaranteed.

A solution is needed. The most effective and narrowly tailored solution is the adoption of uniform rules governing examination access and eligibility list treatment for servicemembers on military leave. The employee should be afforded constructive access to the promotional process through a make-up examination after return from service or deferred scoring and eligibility list placement tied to the examination cycle the employee would have reasonably

entered but for military service.

Consistent with USERRA's purpose, the servicemember should be treated as though they never left the workforce; ranked among the cohort they would have competed against and considered for promotion on a provisional basis pending examination and scoring. This approach allows employers to proceed with operationally necessary promotions while preserving the servicemember's place in the promotional process. Any provisional status would resolve upon examination, aligning final list placement with demonstrated merit rather than the happenstance of military orders.

This approach does not expand USERRA rights or confer preferential treatment. USERRA guarantees opportunity, not promotion. Standardized examination access rules simply operationalize the escalator principle within a merit-based civil service system. If USERRA is to function meaningfully where advancement depends on testing and eligibility lists, access to those examinations must be treated as a substantive right rather than an administrative accommodation.

Private employers should address USERRA compliance by adopting promotional policies that account for military leave through deferred evaluations, retroactive promotion review, and objective advancement criteria. Where promotion would have occurred with reasonable certainty absent service, employers should adjust title, pay, or seniority accordingly, supported by clear written standards and documentation.

NOTE:

New Jersey's Law Against Discrimination independently prohibits discrimination based on military service obligations, providing a parallel source of liability where missed examinations or list placement disadvantage returning servicemembers.

January 2026 Wine Column

by Janice Heinold, Esq.

Happy New Year to one and all! I hope the holidays were a time of celebration, with a few days of relaxation for you. My December was full of celebratory meals, accompanied by some great wines.

The final dinner at Park Place before it closed for good was a bittersweet affair. The food was phenomenal, as always, and we were celebrating a friend's 55th birthday, yet it was hard to forget that this would be our last ever dinner at Park Place.

The first wine of the night was an NV Olivier Marteaux Blanc des Sables Champagne. Olivier Marteaux is a grower-producer. Unlike major champagne houses such as Moët & Chandon that purchase grapes from farmers and then make wine from them (negotiant-manipulant), Marteaux grows the grapes and makes the wine on his estate (recoltant-manipulant). RM Champagnes are small batch, farm-to-table, artisanal Champagnes.

The Blanc des Sables is a brut nature (zero dosage/very dry) champagne made from 100% Chardonnay grown in the Vallée de la Marne, near Azy-sur-Marne, a village located about an hour southwest of Reims. With notes of apricot, peach, tea, and brioche, fine bubbles, and a good balance of acidity, this was an elegant start to the evening. It paired wonderfully with the American Red Snapper Crudo with shaved wild mustard root and seeds, magic oil, and Atlantic Sea Salt. 12% ABV. I found it online for about $60.

The last wine of the evening was a 1970 Chateau d'Yquem Sauternes, the birthday boy's birth year bottle. What can be said about Chateau d'Yquem that hasn't already been said? It's the nectar of the gods. 1970 was a good vintage, with aromas of toffee, apricot, honey, with a finish lasting minutes, not seconds. It is dessert in and of itself, but paired perfectly with a foie gras-filled crepe with New Jersey Red Maple Syrup. A spectacular way to finish a nine-year run of incredible meals. 13% ABV. I found it online from $300 to $1000.

We will sorely miss Park Place, but wish Chef Phil the best in his new endeavor, whatever it will be.

For Festivus, several of us met in Chinatown for an Omakase dinner at Nakama. In my mind, sushi means Champagne and Riesling. There were several delightful Champagnes opened during the 15-course tasting menu, but I brought a 2023 Schäfer-Frölich Monzinger Halenberg Grosses Gewächs (GG) from the Nahe region in Germany. The Nahe river flows through the Rhineland-Palatinate, and the village of Monzingen was mentioned as a wine village as early as 778.

Tim Schäfer-Frölich is an incredibly talented winemaker, one of the top ten in Germany. Tim's wines are my favorite Rieslings, and I splurge for a couple of his Grosses Gewächs each year. A Grosses Gewächs is a classification for dry, single-vineyard wines of the highest quality of a region, similar to France's Grand Cru designation.

While I should have aged this a bit longer, I couldn't wait to share it. It had that classic Riesling flinty aroma, and on the palate, slate minerality and citrus notes, with great structure and tension. 12.5% ABV; I paid $89 for it, and found it in other vintages available online for about $80.

Wishing you a happy and healthy 2026, full of good food paired with great wines! Cheers!
